into a history of the debt from his standpoint, resterating his 334 doctrine. The speaker had not had a platform since the war to suit him. He had voted for 40-4, but likes 50-3 better. He ventured a prespeaker had not had a platform since the war to suit him. He had voted for 40-4, but likes 50-3 better. He ventured a prediction that if Hawkins is elected and it is attempted to carry out 60-6 the debt will never be settled. But he desired to leave the State debt question to Bate, and discuss the debt question to Bate, and discuss the national debt, which is held almost exclusively in the North. He claimed the credit of getting the State debt down as low as it is, and said if it is wiped out entirely he will not cry over it as much as he did over the loss of his negroes, but denied that he is a repudiationist. He said he didn't want to repudiate the National debt, but it is because he can't. He pro-nounced the bonded debt worse slavery than African slavery, which he defended, and pronounced, to a certain extent, a benefit, and pronounced its death a source of deso-lation and sadness to the South. These national bonds, he said, grew out of the war. He hated war, although he had been in four, and if he had omnipotent power he would decree that no war debt and no war would decree that no war debt and no war interest should ever be paid. He declared that as long as the bondholders live they will elect every president, and the Democrats will never elect one. Slavery, while it existed, elected every Democratic president, he said, with one or two exceptions. He read copions extracts from his own speeches, and declared himself a candidate for the United States. Senate, and he thought he could do for the national debt what he has done for the State.
